

First, I hope the this is the proper place for submitting commentary regarding FCC consideration of allowing cell phones to be used for communications purpose during commercial flights within the US. In the event that this communication has not gone through the proper channel, please advise regarding the proper method for submitting consumer commentary on this matter.

My name is Brian Mason, and I am a frequent business traveler, flying approximately 30,000 miles per year. I am also a heavy cell phone user, and regularly use a cell phone during my travel. It is my opinion that the FCC should not allow cell phones to be used on board the aircraft while the plane is in flight. My reasons for this are that there are too many people within a confined space, and that problems are sure to arise. With the increased level of "chatter" from usage of cell phones, there will be a rising level of "air-rage", and that there will be less attention given to the flight attendants and to the pilots of the aircraft.

Thank you,

Brian Mason
